[HUGHES LOGO]

On October 28, 2001, EchoStar Communications announced definitive agreements for a merger with Hughes Electronics. The combined company will be named EchoStar and use the DIRECTV brand for its direct broadcast satellite (DBS) service. The new company will offer local broadcast channels, competitively priced broadband service and nationwide pricing to every home in America. The merger will also bring real competition to the pay television market, where entrenched cable companies now control almost 80 percent of American TV households.

Local Channels for All Americans

Neither EchoStar nor DIRECTV alone has sufficient spectrum or the satellite resources necessary to provide local broadcast channels in all 210 television designated market areas ("DMAs"). Today, the companies each provide mainly redundant service to fewer than 50 of America's largest television DMAs, leaving many residents of smaller cities and rural towns without access to local news, weather and sports via satellite.

As a result of the merger, the new EchoStar will have the satellite and spectrum resources necessary to provide local broadcast programming to DBS customers in all 210 American DMAs, including full compliance with "must-carry" requirements. This enhanced offering will bolster competition with cable in the DMAs where satellite cannot currently offer local channel service.

Affordable Broadband for Every American Home, School and Business

Today, millions of Americans – many in rural areas – have little or no access to high-speed Internet service. DSL providers, phone companies and cable operators have not made the investments to connect rural homes, schools and businesses, and these disadvantaged American households find themselves on the losing side of the “digital divide.”

The merger will bring competitively priced broadband services to every American home, school and business. The very nature of satellite technology and the economies of scale created by the merger will allow the merged company to bring broadband to locations not served by cable modem or DSL providers. Without the merger, however, 40 million American households will continue to have little or no access to broadband service.

One Nation, One Rate Card

Today, both EchoStar and DIRECTV offer DBS services at nationwide prices, a policy that makes the most business sense for national programming distributors because it simplifies advertising, billing and customer service activities. Consequently, customers in the most remote areas of the country pay the same rates for the same services as those living in the nation’s largest cities, extending the benefits of competition with cable to everyone. EchoStar’s Chairman, who will be the Chairman of the merged company, has committed under oath to continue this national pricing system after the merger.
